Developed within TCS Research & Innovation Labs in 2015, ignio has evolved as a top performing software globally, clocking revenue of $31 million in just its third year. Around 50 firms globally, many of which are Fortune 500 companies, use the software at present, with average revenue per customer of $550,000 per annum. However while most of its users are from TCS's existing client base, the software major product to offer it as a standalone product, even offering the same to rival service providers.

"Ignio is a standalone brand and has been built to potentially be a standalone product company, both in terms of business model and architecture," said Rajesh Gopinathan, CEO and MD of TCS.

He said ignio as a product has been able to meet the expectations of clients by delivering value within weeks after deployment, which has made Digitate — the TCS unit that owns ignio — "among the best performing software product companies within the first

According to analysts, for an artificial intelligence (AI)-based product like ignio to be successful, enhancing the user base is extremely critical, which TCS is looking to drive now. This is because the product requires a lot of user data to continuously learn and improve the expertise.

"In the past, Infosys also carved a separate identity for their banking solution (Finacle) to the extent that even competitors used it. So, if TCS seeks to compete with product companies, a separate identity is likely to boost adoption among competitors," said Pareekh Jain, senior vice-president (research), and managing director (India) of HFS Research.

"While similar products are available in the market from software providers, there will

Ashutosh Sharma, vice-president of Forrester service, added: "Usually, service providers have a natural tendency to combine these offerings (products like Ignio) with their application maintenance and infrastructure support services. Engagement wise, it is more sticky and has a revenue upside. Besides, there is always a service component to be addressed during implementation and ongoing support."

Around 83 per cent of ignio's revenue is generated from licensed contracts and the rest contributed by services. ignio clients are largely from retail at 25 per cent, BFSI (bank-
